

ABSTRACT

A method includes converting ambient energy into an original alternating quantity and into energy and splitting the alternating quantity into a first alternating quantity and a second alternating quantity. The first alternating quantity and the second alternating quantity are separately and differently influenced by a measured quantity. The first alternating quantity is used for modulating a reflector. The second alternating quantity is used for modulating a reflector. A corresponding device for performing the method is also provided.